The rule of law ensures that governments administer laws accurately and impartially, but it also prevents the majority, or their elected representatives, from imposing laws that violate natural justice, including those that affect minority groups disproportionately. Unless the executive and the legislature respect the independence of the courts and comply with their rulings, democracy is at risk: the government can muzzle critical voices in the media with repressive libel laws; civil society organisations and whistle-blowers cannot hold governments or parliaments to account when they uncover corruption.
